Our sportsmen Abroad.

The one fact of greatest interest in the meet between the picked men of Harvard and Yale and the athletes of the English universities at the Queen's club, London, is that the Englishmen won a score of five events to four almost wholly on their staying power. In the running contests, particularly in the mile and great three mile match, this was plainly demonstrated. The weakness of the Americans in this respect may, in part at least, be ascribed to not being acclimated. The lesson to our college boys is that they cannot cross the Atlantic and in a short time expect to overcome the climatic conditions in favor of native athletes in contests at distances requiring both speed and endurance. The speed at both a quarter and a half mile is so high that it makes a short call on the heart and the greater distances prolong the call so that only thoroughly acclimated organs can respond. The next international meeting between college athletes should be held in this country, where the climatic conditions will favor the losers in the last struggle. Turn about is fair play.

The recent lease of the Boston and Albany railroad to the New York Central and Hudson River Railroad company is for a term of a thousand years, or rather, to be explicit, 999 years. When the term expires, there will be very few of us living, very few indeed, but the road in some form or another will doubtless be operated, and there will no doubt be alive lessees and lessors to pay and receive the rentals. Quite in line with this idea of keeping an account with the remote future is the suggestion of bonding municipalities for 100, 150 or 200 years at a small rate of interest for vast municipal improvements—parks, water supply, public buildings, boulevards and the like. It is argued that the present generation would be privileged to enjoy these improvements, while the future generations, which would have them already provided for their enjoyment, could well afford to pay for them, as the future will be richer than the present, as the present is richer than the past.

In view of the rapid growth of West Indian and South American emigration and the considerable emigration to Cuba and neighboring islands which our present relations with them will bring about, the important questions to be considered are those of acclimation and immunity from tropical diseases to which people of cooler climes are especially subjected. The "white man's burden" is not so much one of arms as of sanitation. Joseph Chamberlain was right when he said the other day that "the man who shall successfully grapple with this foe to humanity and make the tropics livable for the white man will do more for the white man at home than the British empire than the man who adds a new empire to the wide domain of the queen." What Mr. Chamberlain says of Great Britain is true of our present and prospective relations with the tropics.

An educational statistician, who has received figures from 178 universities and colleges, finds, out of a total of about 52,000 students in attendance, that nearly 21,000 are from the agricultural classes, or a percentage of 42.02, from the farm. This is a fine tribute to the general intelligence of the families of the American farmers and indicates the high hopes and deep aspirations of their sons and daughters.
