NSS Cameraman Completes 3-Day Kodak Clinic

Douglas Orbaker, photographer at Newark State School, was among 19 photographers from state hospitals for the mentally ill and state schools for the retarded who recently attended the first New York State Department of Mental Hygiene workshop on institution photography.

The conference included two days of the regular educational program on basic photography at the Eastman Kodak Company and a one-day meeting on special aspects of photography in mental institutions. Julian Belin, senior photographer for the Department of Mental Hygiene, led a workshop on technical problems. Margaret M. Farrar, the department's director of public relations, conducted a session on photo-journalism and discussed "The Camera as a Communication Tool." Harold Wolfe, assistant commissioner for communications, welcomed the participants and talked with them about the need to develop an improved and expanded photography program for the department.

The Eastman program was initiated several years ago to assist in-plant cameramen in learning new processes, techniques and uses. The workshop was tailored to the needs of photographers in state hospitals and schools after consultations with department staff members. Workshop sessions were held on lighting, cameras and camera techniques, portrait work, negative processing including re-touching, printing techniques and finishing.
