DELLAH. Sir Thomas Winton was a widower, and his present family consisted of two daughters somewhere between eighteen and thirty and a son. There were several young besides myself at Winton's.

Before the evening was over I felt certain that I had won the prize, and also, that she was worth winning; for Faddy was not the man to court undervalued beauty.

"Well," said he, as soon as we were alone, "I suppose that you and I have been asked down here for the same thing."

"Oh yes," replied Sir Thomas; "he has paid up on his shares, and he anticipates his A's, and he has really very fine whiskers!"

"Shut up," O'Brian said. "Do not boast of your own imperfections upon my table. And what were you asked here for?"

"To act, of course. If it had not been for my success in Sir Thomas's office, O'Rigger at Lady Rock at I might have gone hang before ever I had been a guest in this elegant establishment."

"There was undoubtedly a sentiment that we should have to do with the cynicism of O'Brian's; for on the following day the subject of private theatricals was quietly broached in my presence by Miss Winton."

"My theatrical taste had never as yet led me to take a part in any performance, and indeed, of the ladies and gentlemen of the company, the part of Maria it was with the supposition that you would be Fortescue," said she.

"I have it," cried Sir Thomas. "One of my acquaintances is a great actor, and he will play the part of Maria."

And such things make all the difference, you know. To be kissed, even in the most innocent manner, has been for the first time a week before, makes one feel nervous. But there! (At this point I went down on one knee.)

"I was cast for Fortescue, which was the business now went as smoothly as a hand passed over my cheeks. I had the intoxicating privilege, the tantalizing element in which was tempered with hope of making me a clerk."

"I am going to be married to the prettiest little angel you ever wore in your life," said she, looking up at me with a smile.
