FROM BLACK TO WHITE — Actor-comedian, Godfrey Cambridge (right), who plays the role of a white knight, who suddenly turns black in the Columbia Pictures release, "Watermelon Man," underwent a daily two-hour session with veteran makeup man Ben Farnsworth, and Cambridge's pigment.

Columbia's Lane first tried light base, but that made Cambridge look pasty. The final makeup blend turned out to be an orange tone which subdued Cambridge's pigment sufficiently to permit application of regular theatrical makeup over it. Interestingly, the makeup was so effective, that the Academy Award winner, Estelle Parsons, who co-stars as Cambridge's wife, had to have her skin lightened after acquiring a deep tan on the tennic courts. In addition to the special makeup, the "white" Cambridge also wears a wig of medium brown straight hair and false eyebrows to match.

Producer John Bennett said the "Watermelon" story is "precedent, in that it is the first time on film that a black man actually portrays a 'white man.' The Bennett-Mireis (Executive Producer) Leon Mireis-Victor Productions, also set another precedent: Melvin Van Peebles became the first black man to direct a major motion picture in its entirety in Hollywood.
