For Women Your Body, Your Health

By DR. F. J. CLARK

Dr. Clark's column is prepared with the cooperation of the American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists. Letters and questions should be sent to: Dr. John F. J. Clark, ACOG, 79 W. Monroe St., Chicago, Illinois 60603.

Year by year the percentage of women in this country who are in the work force increases. Large numbers of these are married women whose earnings are important to the support of their families. Many of them, in fact, are the principal wage earners for their families.

Should a woman work during pregnancy? Along with how much need there is for the money she earns, a woman's decision should be based on how well she feels, on the kind of work she does and her own psychological feelings about continuing to work.

Recently, The American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists issued a statement giving its views on the pregnant employee. The obstetric specialists said that it is desirable for the working woman to see her physician during the first two or three months of pregnancy, both to verify that she actually is pregnant and for a thorough initial examination. At this time, a recommendation can be made regarding work during the remainder of pregnancy.

Then the statement adds: "If the patient continues in good health, feels well, and the pregnancy proceeds normally, there is generally no reason why a normal working schedule cannot be continued until close to the expected date of delivery."

There are other recommendations: Like other pregnant women, the working woman should get sufficient rest and exercise and eat foods which adequately supply her increased nutritional needs. She, and her employer, should consider these basic health needs in determining if a normal work schedule can be continued.

For the working woman, as for all women, her regular visits to the doctor are an important part of good prenatal care. How long she should continue to work is determined by the woman and her physician at these visits.

After the baby is born, when can the working mother return to her job? The College says that adequate time should be allowed for complete recovery from the effects of childbirth before resuming a full work load. It gives this physiological changes to return to normal, but in individual instances, a longer time may be required for this, or for adjustment of feeding or other problems of baby care."

Good care includes a checkup after the baby is born and the mother has been at home for about six weeks. At this "postpartum" checkup, the doctor can determine whether she is now able to return to her normal work schedule.

It should be remembered that housework, is work too, and that the heavier household chores are often more physically demanding than the job which brings a welcome paycheck at the end of the week. The doctor will advise both working and non-working mothers how much of their usual home activities they can resume, and when they can resume them fully.

I will discuss work and pregnancy some more in my next column.
