TICONDEROGA, N. Y.

FRIDAY MORNING, APRIL 25, 1884.

The Utica Convention.

Our Hon. N. C. Boynton was made chairman and Theodore Roosevelt, Andrew D. White, John I. Gilbert and Edwin Packard were chosen delegates to Chicago. The Edmunds men held the balance of power, and the above is their naming.

At the New Jersey Republican convention last Friday a colored man was chosen delegate in preference to ex-secretary of the navy, Robeson. We call attention to this not to illustrate the growth of the "fraternity and equality" principle amongst us, for more striking examples than this are abundant, but to show the steady and constant increase of honesty and justice among us as a people. Few men possessed the requisite qualities of success to a greater degree than Robeson. A man of imposing presence, of unquestioned ability and accomplishment, an able and ready speaker, capable of moving almost any assembly, with the comprehensive grasp and applicative power of a true statesman, perfectly conversant with every modern political art, with powerful friends and immense wealth, with an endless amount of bluff and assurance, coupled with a certain bonhomie that silenced remonstrance and carried off in part our righteous feelings of disgust, and enabled him to triumph where a more sensitive and less hardy malefactor would have succumbed. But he was morally unsound and therefore not more complete and humiliating is the downfall of his tool, Keiter, than is his own, when once the people were thoroughly convinced of this fact.

Rev. Moncure D. Conway, the celebrated English Rationalistic preacher, whose contributions to the magazines have made his name familiar to many of our readers, has just returned to London from a journey around the world. He found this country so attractive that he has resigned his pastorate and intends to come here and reside. In an interview with a reporter the other day he thus expressed himself: "A long and varied experience has convinced me that a man with brains, ideas and ability for effective work can do more real good by using his talents in the United States than he can accomplish anywhere else. The Americans can be influenced in favor of right changes. They are disposed to do what they can be shown is right. They have no prejudices in favor of existing wrong systems. They are the salt of the modern world. It is almost impossible for any person who well knows America and the Americans to be contented with life anywhere outside of the United States. Believe me the majority of Englishmen who have visited the United States and become properly acquainted with the real character of the country look upon it, with longing eyes, as the earthly promised land. I returned from my recent tour around the world with such new visions concerning America that I find myself discontented here and unable to resist the desire to return and remain there." Mr. Conway's utterance are not so startling as those of Sir Lepel Griffen but they will strike the average European-American as being a thousand times more truthful.

That relic of the preceding generations, the state paper, has met its merited but long deferred doom. After next March the official printing of the state, will be done in the counties to which it belongs.

You may pack caucuses, you may stifle utterances, you may possibly elect your man, but the public will be bound to be carried out ultimately so sure as the heaven is above the earth.

The house committee have unanimously reported against the bill limiting the life of patents.
