

SKI TIPS

TRAVERSE RUNNING POSITION

The traverse position is used for crossing the slope. Since it is quite difficult to hold the snowplow position for any length of time, the traverse position is used more extensively.

In the traverse position, the skis are parallel and quite close together. Most of the weight is on the downhill ski. The uphill ski, knee, hip, and shoulder are slightly advanced.

To keep most of the weight on the downhill ski, the downhill shoulder is dropped over the downhill ski.

The knees and ankles are slightly flexed forward with poles held at the sides and pointed behind the skier.

As the skier moves across the slope horizontally at a slight downhill angle, the skis are on their uphill edges, so that the direction of motion is exactly the same as that in which the skier is moving. If this is true, there should not be any sidestepping.

Lost? Watch Out!

One of the hazards of traversing open country in a snowmobile is getting lost. If you wear a watch, you'll never be at a loss for good directions.

You can convert your watch into a compass by just remembering a simple trick. If the sun is in the sky, point the small hand at the sun. Half the distance between the small hand and the "12" is south. Facing south, the east is at your left and the west at your right.

Finding directions by the stars is no more difficult.

The North Star, Polaris, is for all practical purposes true north. To find it you must first locate the Big Dipper which is composed of a three-star handle and a four-star cup. The two stars forming the outer edge of the cup point to the North Star.
